they make good pies?".

OO "They certainly will," assured Miss Mary with dancing eyes, "and you may stop on your way to school to-morrow at On noon and get a pièce." "Thank you ma'am," grinned Jimmy And it came to pass, on the next day, when he appeared at her door, Miss Mary met him with a whole little pie baked in a small pan. It was a sliced apple pie, and he could see some of the juicy filling between the bars of rich, brown crust, which were laced back and beautiful pie that ever was. He started toward the school house with it, and met the same stranger who had encoun tered Tommy. "Say, sonny," coaxed the man, "wha will you take for that pie?"

"Nothing," answered Jimmy, quickening his pace. "You can't get this pie at

"Now that's too bad," said the stran-ger in a mournful tone, though his eyes

"Maybe it is," agreed Jimmy, as he turned back and pointed toward the house. "There's where I got it. Go and get you one."
"Is there a pie counter there?"
"No," scoffed Jimmy, "but Miss Mary's there, and there's always pie where she is."

"How nice that sounds," laughed the "It tastes better than it sounds." declared Jimmy. The man walked up Miss Mary's steps and knocked, and when Miss Mary came to the door, he removed his hat and dis-Porter Street, South Paris

"No'm," assured Tommy. "She told me to bring it, but I didn't want to, and

"All right. You come around to-mor-row and get your pie."
"I will," promised Tommy, as he ran

That piece of pie was so pretty Tom-my just hated to bite into it. Its side presented a golden and a white stripe, which filled Tommy's idea of art. As he walked along, looking at it, a stranger accosted him.

"Say, son, where'd you get that pie?"
"Miss Mary gave it to me," said Tom,

my proudly.
"Not Miss Mary Fridell!" exclaimed

Gee! but it was fine."
"What else could I take her?"
"Apples?" suggested Tommy.
"No," Johnny shook his head dis consolately.

"Plums," shouted Tommy victoriousy. "You have the very best late plums

"Sure enough," said Johnny with sigh of relief.

Johnny could hardly wait for his last lesson so he could run home. Once there, he hunted a basket and asked to plums. His mother was surprised, but she was also much pleased at Johnny's thoughtfulness. She helped him fill the basket with the finest ones, and a short time later Miss Mary was answering another knock at the door.

"Why, Johnny!" she exclaimed.
"Now, this surely is good of you. What can I offer you to show you how thankful I am?"

"Is there any more pumpkin pie?"
inquired Johnny hopefully.

"I'm sorry, Johnny," said Miss Mary,
"but I sent one to the minister's wife, and one to old Mrs. White, because she never gets out any, and I gave the school-ma'am a piece this afternoon, and there's no pumpkin pie left. I'll tell you what, I'll make a plum pie to-morrow—just the very best one—and as you go back to school to-morrow at noon, you may stop and get a piece."

"That'll do all right," declared Johnny, and went home with visions of that

The next day at noon he was at Miss

Mary's door, and when she appeared his eyes grew round with delight. His piece of pie, he thought, was ever so much prettier than Tommy's, for the stripes were a rich, dark red and white, and on the top just the faintest sprinkle of red sugar.

Johnny thanked Miss Mary properly, and went toward the school house with his pie. He was soon the center of a group of small boys, whose mouths were watering, but Johnny walked right on.

His nose stuck into the meringue every time he took a bite, but that did not disturb him in the least. By and by the group went back to marbles and other games, all but Jimmy Spencer. Johnny gave him what was left.

"U-m-m!" said Jimmy. "Where'd

you get it?''
"Miss Mary Fridell gave it to me."

"Well, I took her a basket of plums," answered Johnny, loftily.

"I've got some apples," ventured Jimmy. "Do you reckon she likes apples?"

"Of course," replied Johnny. "Everybody does if there's any marrow in his
